Franklin/ New Zealand History            Reflection of important or representative aspects of Franklin's and/or NZ's history. Psychiatric hospitals were part of New Zealand's history until the 1990s when the emphasis shifted to community care. The former Kingseat Hospital is a representative example of those psychiatric hospitals. The Administration Building was opened in 1938 and as one of the original buildings, it has played an important part in the development of the Kingseat site.
Community Association/Public Esteem            Community association with/or public esteem for the place. Kingseat Hospital is likely to have had community associations by providing employment for local inhabitants.
Technical Accomplishment/ Architectural Design            The Administration Building is an institutional building, the design of which was influenced by both the Modernist and Art Deco Movements of the day. Such details as the steel balustrade on the first floor balcony add to the aesthetic value of the building. Originally the central wing culminated in a parapet with a flat roof behind, a detail typical of its architectural style. Its original character has been compromised by the addition in 1957 of the second storey with its hipped roof.

Rare Types of Historic Places Importance of identifying rare types of historic places or resources. Other examples of former psychiatric hospitals exist in New Zealand including Tokanui in Te Awamutu, Sunnyside in Christchurch, Lake Alice in Manawatu and Seacliff and Waikari in Dunedin. Kingseat was one of two such hospitals in Auckland, the other being Oakley (Carrington). Kingseat was the only hospital in the south Auckland area. The administration building has rarity value as a building designed for a particular purpose, that of providing administrative functions for the hospital.
Historical/ Cultural Landscape The former Kingseat Hospital can be considered to be part of the historical landscape of the south Auckland area and the Administration building is an integral part of that landscape. The Administration building was placed in a prominent location on the Kingseat site. It faces onto an open space and is clearly visible from the road, being positioned on the axis of the driveway. It also provides a focal point on the site with the other buildings being grouped around it. The building was arguably the most important building on the site as it housed all the administrative functions. The significance of the site as a whole would be reduced if the Administration block were to be removed.

Description	Significance of Elements	Elements
Psychiatric hospitals were part of New Zealand's history until the 1990s when the emphasis shifted to community care. The former Kingseat Hospital is a representative example of those psychiatric hospitals. The villas were an attempt to provide a more social environment and to provide patients with more freedom within the psychiatric hospital environment. The villas were, therefore, an important aspect of life at Kingseat.
Technical Accomplishment/ Architectural Design  The earliest villas were built in 1930 and essentially the same design continued to be used for additional villas built around the site until 1946. The villas were institutional buildings designed in the Neo-Georgian style. Indicators of the Neo-Georgian style include the symmetry of the design and the multi-paned upper sashes
Rare Types of Historic Places  Other examples of former psychiatric hospitals exist in New Zealand including Tokanui in Te Awamutu, Sunnyside in Christchurch, Lake Alice in Manawatu and Seacliff and Waikari in Dunedin. Kingseat was one of two such hospitals in Auckland, the other being Oakley (Carrington). Kingseat was the only hospital in the south Auckland area. The villas have rarity value as examples of buildings designed for a particular purpose, that of accommodating psychiatric patients in a residential environment.
Historical/ Cultural Landscape  The former Kingseat Hospital can be considered to part of the historical landscape of the south Auckland area and the villas are an integral part of that landscape. The villas are scattered around the site amongst trees in a park-like setting. They were an attempt to provide a more open residential environment for the patients in contrast to traditional secure facilities with limited access to the outside world. The villas were an integral part of the Kingseat Hospital environment and the significance of the site as a whole would be reduced if they were to be removed.
THE FORMER NURSES HOME
EXTERIOR  Apart from the temporary structures outside the building, the Nurse's Home appears to have had little alteration. It has an overall rating of exceptional significance.	Considerable	Original joinery  Brick walls  Herringbone patterns in brickwork  Corbelled brickwork on entries to verandas  Brick soldier course  Brick chimneys  Cast iron downpipes  First floor balconies  Original light fittings  Concrete balustrades to steps  Symbolic relief sculpture above entrances.
	Intrusive	PVC downpipes  Timber ramp over brick steps at front  Signs on building  Temporary structures outside building  Wire netting on balcony  Floodlights  Corrugated plastic roof above balcony
INTERIOR  The interior of the former Nurse's Home has been altered to some extent to meet the requirements of the current occupiers. However many original features have been retained. The interior of the Nurses' Home has an overall rating of considerable significance.	Considerable	Moulded architraves and skirting board  Decorative plaster ceilings  Marble fire place surrounds  Art Deco fireplaces  Curved staircase  balustrade  Moulded banister on staircase  Mosaic tiles in foyer  Solid plaster walls  Mosaic floor in bathroom

Franklin/ New Zealand History Psychiatric hospitals were part of New Zealand's history until the 1990s when the emphasis shifted to community care. The former Kingseat Hospital is a representative example of those psychiatric hospitals. Nurses played a vital role in the care of psychiatric patients. The Nurses' Home was therefore an important aspect of life at Kingseat.
Community Association/Public Esteem Kingseat Hospital is likely to have had community associations by providing employment for local inhabitants
Technical Accomplishment/Architectural Design The Nurses' Home was constructed in 1939 and has a different character to other buildings on the site to signify its particular purpose. The design of the Nurses' Home was influenced by Art Deco and Modernist architectural styles which were popular at the time. Although it is clearly an institutional building, it has a quality which sets it apart from the other buildings. The patterned brickwork, the Art Deco fireplaces and the decorative plaster ceilings contribute to the building's architectural value.
Rare Types of Historic Places Other examples of former psychiatric hospitals exist in New Zealand including Tokanui in Te Awamutu, Sunnyside in Christchurch, Lake Alice in Manawatu and Seacliff and Waikari in Dunedin. Kingseat was one of two such hospitals in Auckland, the other being Oakley (Carrington). Kingseat was the only hospital in the south Auckland area. The Nurse's Home has rarity value as an example of a building designed for a particular purpose, that of accommodating psychiatric nurses who worked at the hospital.
Historical/ Cultural Landscape The former Kingseat Hospital can be considered to be part of the historical landscape of the south Auckland area and the Nurses' Home is an integral part of that landscape. The Nurse's Home was built just prior to the Second World War to provide essential accommodation for the nurses at Kingseat Hospital. It was placed near the south western boundary and set slightly apart from the other buildings, presumably to allow the nurses' to enjoy some privacy away from the main hospital environment. Living and working together in the relatively secluded location of Kingseat resulted in the formation of a nursing community where strong bonds of friendship developed between the nurses. The significance of the site as a whole would be reduced if the Nurses' Home were to be removed.
THE ANCILLARY BUILDINGS
EXTERIOR The exterior of the ancillary buildings are generally original with only small alterations in some cases. As a group, they have an overall rating of considerable significance.	Some	Original joinery Plaster rendered cornice Brick walls Barrelled roof vents Tongue and groove double doors Original light fittings Super six corrugated roofs Portico on loading bay of storeroom.
	Intrusive	PVC downpipes Asbestos cement additions Roller doors Additions Covered opening
INTERIOR The building interiors have had some alterations over the years and their roles have changed in some cases. They have an overall rating of some significance	Some	Solid concrete walls Exposed steel trusses Exposed timber bolted trusses Tongue and groove doors

Description	Significance of Elements	Elements
	Intrusive	Some internal light fittings Corrugated steel covering Windows and skylights
Franklin/ New Zealand History The ancillary buildings housed carpenters, metalworkers as well as cooking staff and domestic staff. The buildings were instrumental in enabling the hospital to essentially undertake all the maintenance on the site as well as cooking and laundry duties. The ancillary buildings were, therefore, an important aspect of life at Kingseat for both staff and patients, playing a key role in the day to day running of the hospital.
Community Association/Public Esteem Kingseat Hospital is likely to have had community associations by providing employment for local inhabitants. Local people are likely to have been employed as cooking and domestic staff and as gardeners and ground staff.
Technical Accomplishment/Architectural Design The ancillary buildings were probably built over a relatively short period of time between the late 1920s and 1930s, concurrent with the villas. Architects at the Ministry of Works were responsible for the design. Although the structures are recognisable as industrial buildings, their design had similarities to the villas and some have recognisable neo-classical influences. This is seen in details such as the symmetry of the buildings and the portico and columns to the loading bay on the stores building.
Rare Types of Historic Places The ancillary buildings have rarity value as an example of a group buildings designed for a particular purpose, that of assisting in the mechanical day to day running of the hospital environment.
Historical/ Cultural Landscape The former Kingseat Hospital can be considered to part of the historical landscape of the south Auckland area and the ancillary buildings are an important part of that landscape. The ancillary buildings in this group represent the self- sufficient culture of the hospital by providing services for the entire site. They also represent a social aspect of hospital life in that the workshops and woodworking buildings are likely to have been used to assist patients in the rehabilitation process. The ancillary buildings were an integral part of the Kingseat Hospital environment and have particular significance as an intact group. The significance of the site as a whole would be reduced if any were to be removed.
